VERA GWYNNE, TELEPHONE 4509

The Things He Wrote to Her.

The basis of friendship is understanding, the tenure of friendship is sincerity, the fruit of friendship is progress, the crown of friendship is peace.

Reading in its best estate is a sacrament of the mind, to be celebrated devoutly and preceded by expectancy and fasting.

It taught us not to quicken our appreciation of those who have labored to communicate themselves to us through printed things, thereby breathing upon us the endless benediction of their philosophy and song.

A woman is what she is, and must be considered apart from her environment and detached from all the former things in her life. For every woman, in order that she may be a woman, is dowered with sex, and sex is creating conditions which can never be satisfactorily explained before any minor judgment seat.

Sometimes love is a noun and sometimes it is a verb, but always it is a level to lift the loved and make it intrinsically fit to dwell in the environment of altitude and light. And love, the lover, works without being individually conscious of its task. It works easily and well, and because it is love, it cannot not itself, is not puffed up, and finds its joy, not in its own being and essence, but in seeing its object achieve the high place and hold it by sheer right of beauty and power.

Words, after all, are but the vehicles for ideas to ride in, and when once an understanding is reached, speech may mostly be put aside and communication is merged into communion. This is the soul's highest revel, and the aftermath is a clear vision, an ardor for life, and an appreciation of the little tasks which fill the average day and give heart, hand and brain their legitimate employment.

I suppose that every man must take what comes with his nature—must pay the price that is asked for having his particular kind of soul. Hence, if I am impelled from within to do and dare in a free-peopled land, I must take the wounds and loss of blood which go with doing and daring; if I make a bid for life and light, I must expect the balance to be preserved—that death and darkness will also be knocked down to me.—Selected.
